In 1996, former newsreader Selina Scott swapped the glare of TV cameras for a 200-year-old farmhouse in the pine-clad hills of Mallorca's Sierra Tramuntana.

It's a good account of her time, giving a delicious insight into the trials and tribulations of living near the fishing port of San Telm, away from the fish and chips and British pubs of package-deal hotspot Magaluff. It's not all idyllic and dreamy, however, with the idiosyncrasies of living in a small community and her neighbours made up of artists and musicians.

All in all, it's a nice, easygoing account of the life of a career-minded lady who realises there's much more to life than working for a big corporation.
